The Light of Knowing Fundraiser was well attended. The screening of the short film introducing the LoK web series was well received. Jaimie Macari plays the suspended TV news reporter trying to make sense of the world. The various interrogatees gave there answers to the questions of life's mysteries. For a life experience, the excellent food may not have led to a sense of enlightenment, but it didn't harm the quest.

The Boston Film Industry Examiner spoke with many interesting folks on Saturday night. Capturing them on video, we are premiering our series of interviews under the name of the Swamp Yankee Entertainment Network (SYEN) in honor of the fact that we live out here in Hillbilly Massachusetts.

What is most interesting about the film makers interviewed at the LOK fundraiser is that, as far as I know, they are not profiting from the film credits enacted by the various New England States. There are no big product placement deals. Yet that passion to make a movie carries them forward.

The first interviewee gives a reason why she films. A talented writer, she has sold her work and then never seen it go into production. So, you want to see it, you have to do it yourself.

And finally, the great young cameraman from Western Mass who will probably kill me for my unprofessional production values, David Gladstone.

John hartman says:

It's funny to hear you say "Swamp Yankee" productions...the term threw me, because the Civil War film, I mentioned in the interview, "Secession Path" was originally called "Swamp Rebels!"
